The teacher reads the text, reads it again and then explains each paragraph in great detail in the hope that the students will understand it. What children don't know is that the meaning of a story, poem, or prose text is not thrown into stone. Every reader is likely to find personal meaning in texts only if we bring our own experiences to our minds as we read them. Each of us is free to interpret texts in our own ways. When we do that we not only become better readers but also carry the promise of us to become better human beings. Sample work: This year's Hrya Ludaya, when it was time to do a prose extract, Alchemy Nature by Raksha Behredia with STD. X students, refrained from explaining it literally. Instead, I decided to go with the method of learning by working where I asked them to read the text first and then draw different elements of nature mentioned in the text. I encouraged them to write a few lines on their own interpretation of the author's words about how nature inspires us. Although the activity was conducted through a virtual class, I can experience the active and exhilarating participation of students. After the students handed over their explanations, I asked the class for comments and their impact on their learning. Here are some responses from the students, Parshava: it was nice, and the prose was very well understood, as it brought our creativity. Karina: This activity made us realize that we can learn a lot from everything in nature. It was a catalyst for reflection and inspiration. Aisha: I personally enjoyed all the coloring and painting. It had a great impact on the understanding of the concept on our part. It is rightly said that when we do, we understand. This will be stored in my brain forever; the activity was interesting. Usually, we get bored sitting down for online lectures. This activity included drawing which became interesting to us. Read more stories from school such as Nature Alchemy here are some of the students' interpretations of the text, each unique and especially in its own ways. Watching video lectures from Sharon School was this one small step activity among other things that we as a school we take to help children understand that reading is not a mechanical process. Reading is not about looking for facts and answering questions. Reading becomes more important when we make contact with our past experiences and let feelings, feelings and memories wash over us as we read.
